Aggie Law Hosts 4th Annual Access to Justice Conference:

Where Incubators, Residencies, Apprenticeships and Non-profit Law Firms Meet Social Justice

Fort Worth, TX, March 15, 2017 – This Thursday, Texas A&M Law will kick off the 4th Annual Access to Justice Conference. Focused on Incubators, Residencies, Apprenticeships and Non-profit Law Firms. The three-day event includes speakers and participants from around the globe who are interested in incubators and other post-graduate programs to support solo, small firm, and nonprofit practitioners.

Keynote speakers include:

- Chief Justice Nathan L. Hecht, Texas Supreme Court
- Justice Fern Fisher, Deputy Chief Administrative Judge for New York City Courts
- Frank Stevenson, State Bar of Texas President
- Rebecca Sandefur, Associate Professor, Department of Sociology, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

In addition, conference sessions will include workshops and hands-on technology sessions to help participants develop concrete takeaways that will have immediate impact on their work. The conference will describe and advance the continued growth of post-graduate law programs and the new wave of affordable legal services for groups without access to legal resources.

Along with the basics of creating and implementing incubator programs and non-profit law firms, the conference will address, among other topics, the impact on law school curricular reform; collaboration between bench, bar and academics; technology and delivery of legal services; evolution of lawyering role models; and access to justice for low and moderate means clients.
